ancient Greeks experienced and communicated trauma and whether this equates to Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder as we understand it, taking into account the social, cultural and historical context of ancient Greece. By understanding the sheer difference of the Greek experience of trauma and warfare to our modern, Western experience, a clearer picture should emerge as to which, if any, elements of PTSD existed in antiquity.'

Adrienne White, a PhD candidate at the Australian National University, is studying combat trauma in the ancient Greek world. Adrienne's talk will also serve as her Thesis Presentation Review.
